The C R Bishop brought 22 head cattle, 7 calves and 40 pkgs sundries from Hamakua.

A Word Puzzle.

The puzzle loving public are invited to supply the dropped word of each line in the following effusion with a word of one syllable that will make sense, and rhyme with the last word in the first and second lines:—

An Editor sat in his easy (?) chair
 And he said to himself 'How folks would stare
 If I should give to the listening —
 The secrets I hold in my breast, and should

To the eager world every cankering
 That worries an Editor. But I don't —
 To make the disclosure. For I'm certain that —

I'd told to the world how we Editors —
 How we sit not on down but the knottiest —
 Or a mighty poor caskion of make-believe —
 Our quill-driving brothers would rush to our —

And set us astride of a horse or a —

And with a proud curl of each inflated —
 (Of which each man should have for blowing a --)

They would carry us forth to some desolate

(The use of that last word you will find is quite --)

And then pelt us with stones till our body was --

(As a Scotchman would say) and from off of us --)

The clothes from the O.P.M.B. that we --

And leave us alone without staff, cane, or --

To help us to hobble home slowly or --

(See "The Tempest" for that word) and when we got there

They would scarce give us time to mutter a prayer

Ere they sent us to dwell in the place that's called--Blest,

Where we ever would sing--O give us a rest."

BOOKS AND SEEDS

Which the Congressman Sends to His Constituents.

Not the Way to Secure the Good Will of the Voters at Home--The Reason Why.

[Washington Star.]

"That man won't come back to con-gress again," said one of the employes of the house folding-room to The Star man the other day, pointing to the frank on one of a huge pile of square packages heaped up on the table and in one corner of the room.

"Why so?" asked The Star man.
 "Just because these things will prevent it."

"What's in 'em? Dynamite?"

"Books."

"Books?"

"Yes, he's sending them all through his district, and he'll never come back any more, poor fellow! This is his first term and he has fallen into the delusion that the way to please his constituents is to send them books. They don't cost him anything, and he thinks it a good way to buy the good will of his constituents. He hasn't been here long enough to learn bet-ter."

"Don't you know," he continued, assum-ing a more confidential tone, "the mem-bers, almost without exception, who have begun by sending books home to their dis-tricts have been defeated. It's a fact. It defeats them every time."

"How is that? What are the books about?" The Star man asked.

"Tisn't what's in them. The books are all right, except that some of them are sort of dry. They are the various reports, agricultural, interior department, patent office reports, and the like; scientific works on surveys, geology, agriculture, and the various matters that have been looked into under the 'direction of congress and the executive departments, besides the execu-tive documents, the president's messages and reports upon foreign relations, com-merce, and the like. Oh, they are all good enough books, as far as that goes. That isn't the thing."

"What is it, then?"

"Why, it's just this. When a man knows how to do it those books can be used to an advantage; but it won't do for him to distribute them loosely among his constituents. I'll defeat him, sure pop. The old member, who has experi-ence, will make a good selection of books and send them to three or four of the lead-ing politicians in his district. That's all right; it does some good. But when the new member undertakes to distribute them among all his constituents he gets himself in trouble. He can't have enough to go round, and the consequence is that neighbors Smith and Thompson get jealous because neighbor Jones got some books and they didn't; and when it comes to the election they will let the member know that their vote is as good as neighbor Jones'. See? That's the way lots of young members get caught."

"There's Maginnis; he won't send out a book. He has the longest list of any man in the house. I asked him one day: 'Major, why don't you send some of your books home?' 'My predecessor got beat that way,' was his reply, and the pile of books is still growing."

"Don't any of the old members send their books home?" asked the scribe.

"Oh, yes; lots of them do, but they put them in the hands of the politicians, and not the mass of voters. Yes, yes; they send off lots of books and seeds, and that sort of thing, but they wait until the end of the session and send out all at one time to those who know how to handle them. Many, however, like Maginnis, pay no at-tention to them. Judge Kelley never does, nor does Charlie O'Neill nor Bingham. Harmer trades his books off for seeds. Bayne distributes his judiciously. Brewer, of New Jersey, ships his home in a lump and then distributes them as he sees proper. Some of the members do lots of trading with their books. Those from the cities trade with those from the country, giving them the agricultural reports for the more valuable scientific works. Then some of the country members trade off all of their books for seed. Some of the members sell their books to second-hand dealers; while others buy as many as they can get. I know of one new member who spent several thousand dollars sending books and seeds to his con-stituents. He got beaten. There are a number of members each session who spend large sums of money in this way. They can't get enough out of the appor-tionment to go round in their districts, so they buy them. Some of the scientific works are very expensive. Powell's re-ports cost the government about $17 a piece to publish."

"Some of the members," he added, "send out lots of seed, and it is said, but I don't know how true it is, that the confiding constituents often are deceived by their wily representatives, who, when they can't get enough seeds at government expense, go off and buy a lot of cheap grass seed, and have it done up in small packages, and send it off as something rare."

The Open Polar Sea.

Dr. W. J. Harris, a physician of St. Louis, writes thus in The Globe-Democrat concerning Dr. Pavy, one of the victims of the Greely party: Dr. Pavy's constant dream was to enter the Arctic regions by way of Behring's straits, carrying a portable boat on sledges over the belt of ice, and as soon as the open polar sea was reached to launch the boat and sail away to the pole, returning by way of Greenland to the Atlantic the following season. I do not think that Dr. Pavy ever had a shadow of a doubt about the existence of an open polar sea. He has talked to me for hours, and by many ingenious theories proved that such a sea existed.
